note: The painter and print-maker Hans Otto Orlowski (fig. 1) was born in Insterburg near Königsburg in East Prussia. His father was a tailor and moved the family to Königsberg, Potsdam, and then Charlottenburg. Orlowski first studied at the Academy of Decorative Arts in Berlin from 1911 to 1915. But the First World War interrupted his studies and he served briefly as a soldier in Serbia until he was wounded. He was then employed as a draftsman in the War Ministry, but also began producing his first independent prints. In 1918 he returned to art school and became a member of the Berlin Secession, a progressive group whose members included, among others, Lovis Corinth, Käthe Kollwitz, and Emil Nolde. Orlowski graduated in 1919, and in 1921 he began teaching at the Decorative Arts Academy in Charlottenberg, where he remained until 1945. In 1924 he visited Paris, and his style evolved away from Expressionism to a more realistic, even classical, manner applied primarily to nudes. The artist's first one man exhibition was in Berlin in 1934 at the prestigious Wolfgang Gurlitt Gallery, which was one of the first in Germany to show Matisse, Kokoschka, and Corinth. During the Second World War Orlowski was involved with saving the collection of the Berlin National Gallery. His own workshop and apartment were destroyed and many of his paintings and prints lost. Beginning in 1945 he taught at the Berlin University of the Arts and during his last years received a number of exhibitions throughout West Germany.

In the early 1920s Orlowski's nude studies (figs. 2a-b) displayed the angular, intense Expressionist style that was then current in Germany. But by the late 1920s and into the early 1930s his paintings of nudes become more traditional and even classical (figs. 3a-c), but with great attention devoted to the texture of the flesh, the effects of light and dark, and close-up view-points. Girl with a Candle is one of Orlowski's major surviving works from this period. The nearly full-length nude stands before a window, and the candle that she shields with her left hand casts provocative shadows across the rippling plains of her flesh. Lost in her own contemplative concerns, the figure is both sensitive and sensual.

This artistic approach lasted only a short while, Orlowski in the late 1930s and into the 1940s evolved a grander, broader neo-classical style for his nudes (figs. 4a-b) Due to the painter's own editing of his works and the destruction of the War, such early paintings like this by Orlowski are quite rare.
